THURSDAY, OCTOBER 12

4:00 PM

Social Justice and the New Food Activism

Radcliffe Institute for Advanced Study, Knafel Center, 10 Garden Street

The alternative food movement has been tremendously successful at raising awareness of many of the public health and ecological consequences of the conventional food system. Yet, as many (friendly) critics have noted, the focus on market-based alternatives has done very little to undermine industrially-produced food and have not resonated with poor people and communities of color. In the last decade or so, a new food activism has emerged, one that is more contentious, more collective, and more inclusive.

In this talk, Julie Guthman RI '18 will discuss the origins and development of the food movement in order to explain how it came to focus on market based alternatives and also to show how it has evolved in response to critique. She will then discuss three cases that reflect a new food activism, with particular focus on the battle against methyl iodide, a highly toxic chemical that was to replace methyl bromide in strawberry production.
